VANADIUM ORE AT ARROWHEAD

What bears all the earmarks of vanadium appear in the tunnel of the South Arrowhead company, where a two foot ledge was cut to a depth of 60 feet. The mineral resembles a yellow chloride and responds to chemical tests made by J. W. Stewart, owner of the controlling interest in the property. The tests consisted of steeping in nitric acid which turns the ore a deep bluish color. Then peroxide of hydrogen is applied. When this was done a bright red smoke arose proving conclusively that the content of the ore was vanadium. The stuff will be sampled carefully and a quantity shipped to one of the firms specializing in rare metals for chemical analysis. If it should happen that the mineral is vanadium it will be better than a whole mine filled with gold as the metal sells for $5 a pound. Commercial vanadium carries between 5 and 10 per cent and this find is likely to go double that, according to A. J. Sale, the Arrowhead engineer who has had extensive experience in laboratory work, and find at Arrowhead will run between 20 and 30 per cent. The only vanadium found at depth in the United States is on the Colorado-Utah line. All other deposits are shallow and quickly exhausted. The Arrowhead formation is a fissure which apparently goes to great depth from where it was cut by the tunnel at a depth of 64 feet from the surface.
